Enter the Divine Order of Life and Free Yourself from Useless Stress and Sorrow

Key Lesson: Part 1: We cannot hope to find true peace without fulfilling the purpose of (our) life, and we can't fulfill that purpose without awakening to the Web of Divine Relationships within which the purpose of (our) being has already been sown. So that anything working to interfere with this realization is, at best, delaying its revelation...and, at worst, stands in deliberate opposition to a freedom whose perfection cannot be found anywhere else.

Part 2: Before we can see the Divine Life in all things - let alone realize the liberation found only in (Its) unconditional love - all things for us must be the Life of the Divine.

Talk Takeaways

- Though we are not usually aware of it, we live within a field of forces that is perfectly organized.
- Your hope rests in being the willing recipient of the revelations about yourself that are always being given.
- We are not here just to serve nature. We are created to serve a greater good.
- When you are complaining about your life, you are participating in the futile attempt to bring order to the disorder that you perceive.

- Every creature has a built-in capacity to sense whenever something is out of order, out of rhythm.
- When you live from thought only, trying to increase your stature through thought, you are a branch believing that it is the vine.
- Anything created by fear as a path to reestablish order is itself the creation and furtherance of disorder.
- Aside from practical corrections that must be made, if you are trying to straighten out someone that is irritating you because he or she is negative, then you are out of order.
- From a very early age we were all conditioned to believe that of ourselves we must build a life that is in order.
- Everything that you acquire in this world for the sake of security turns out to be the antithesis of security.
- By its very nature, any so-called order established through imitation is actually disorder.
- Persistent resistance to conditions, leading to chronic negative reactions, is a sign of disorder.
- Rushing is an attempt to reestablish order, but the rusher is the epitome of disorder and it will never find the order it imagines.
- Can resistance to a moment bring order to it? No, fundamental change is already built into the Divine order of things, and our task is to change our relationship with the order that already exists.
- Awareness that you are out of order is how you enter into the Divine order that already exists. It does not take thought to be aware that you are embroiled in disorder.
- Practice reset by reconnect: see that what you believe is order, is actually disorder. Let there be awareness of the disorder rather than trying of yourself to reestablish order. The awareness of disorder is Divine order. The light is self-organizing.

- Every relationship is a revelation of true order for the one willing to remain with it.
- Everything that you see in the world that is in disorder is there because you have consented to be a part of a consciousness that finds contentment in disorder.
