

WHEN YOU BELIEVE IN THINGS YOU DON'T UNDERSTAND

We look into a world we can't see is a mirror of our consciousness, so that whatever seems to take place—out there—whatever its temporary form or character—for either its beauty or fear—is inseparable from the consciousness in which it is reflected.

Any and all other forms of perception are a form of duality, and where there is duality there is always some form of fear, and where there is fear there is conflict; and wherever you have fear and conflict you will always find the incessant search for some form of security to mitigate that suffering.
