

On the Threshold of Another World

There is a door that swings both ways...where the difference between open and shut can be as narrow as the threshold over which that door stands guarding it. So it is with the weakness of fear, and the strength of grace.

Our choice, if it can be called that, is to recognize this ever-present “razor’s edge” within us and, whenever we can remember to do so, to move in the direction of what we know is good and true for us, and for others. We can do no more or less than this, and it is this (silent) action that determines whether we enter the higher worlds within us, or find ourselves shut out of those Divine possibilities.

Persist with your wish—and work—to understand this life you have been given, and your role within it. If you will remain true to this, your new intention, then in time your interior work becomes choiceless, and you are set free, accordingly, because now you live in this world, but you are no longer of it.

— Guy Finley