You Are Made for the Moment You Meet

Original Talk Date: February 8, 2017

Key Lesson: Part 1: This moment - now - is the timeless ground, seed, and fulfillment of all that is possible for us to be; to discover its riches is the first step in realizing, and then reclaiming our True Self.

Part 2: Wanting to be anything other than aware of what creation is ceaselessly showing you about yourself is wasting what Life itself wants for you: a chance to realize, and become as one with a new and higher level of consciousness attainable in no other way.

Talk Takeaways

- Nature has nothing interfering between the request that life makes, the response to it, and what is born as a result. It is a seamless string of relationship.
- Life makes a request, then there is a natural and necessary reaction, and then there is a response that wants to know what the reaction is. The response is always something that is part of our conditioned nature.

- What is intended to be a marriage between Heaven and earth is interfered with by a nature that names the reaction so that it can go on living at the expense of something changing in you.
- You live from a consciousness that doesn't want anything to happen to it that it does not understand.
- The "you" that defines the problem IS the problem. It is not seeking to resolve the problem; it is seeking the continuation of itself.
- What you receive from life is always on the same level of the nature that asks for what it does.
- In the story about the young man on the golf driving range, he had nothing to prove, was willing to learn from what he was doing wrong, and agreed to go into difficult moments rather than avoid them.
- The nature that convinces you to avoid trials does not have the ability to remember that you were made for those trials.
- You were made to take life's tests, and to succeed at them. But most of the choices we make are either to avoid the test that we are meant to take, or to take only those tests that we already know we can succeed at.
- "Who keeps one thing in view makes all things serve." -- Robert Browning
- You have something inside of you that is perfectly suited to reconcile every single reaction you have.
- We do not remember that we can reach up in the moment of trial because we identify with the responses that are handed to us.
- Start preferring to discover something new about yourself over trying to prove yourself.
- The idea of "limitation" could not exist without believing that you are supposed to be more than you are in the moment. You avoid meeting so-called limitations because you believe that you have to prove that you are more than you actually are.
- Life is not asking you to prove yourself; it is asking you to see the part of you that believes it must prove itself.

- Your experience of the condition you are in cannot be separated from your understanding of it.
- If conditions are always changing, then so should the reactions and responses to those conditions. However, habitual responses are set in stone; they do not flow with changing conditions; habitual responses fight against changing conditions.
- Use conditions to remember that you are made to meet them. And if you are made to meet the moment, then see that it is impossible for who you really are to lose anything. Don't avoid the tests; meet the moment. Only the man or woman who knows there is nothing to prove will ever be free.
