3 Real Wishes that Bring Real Results

Key Lesson: Why waste time wishing on a star for a "better time" to come...when it's possible for you to know that you are a wish made by a star.

Talk Takeaways

- We live under the government of an order of being that makes sure we do not understand that the Divine knows what we need before we know that we need it.
- We have wishes that we think are our own. But not one wish that we have originated with us.
- We have the capacity to manifest some of the things that we desire, but the things that we desire never come with the peace and fulfillment that was promised.
- Every wish that you have for a time to come ensures that you remain a captive of the opposites that are built into time.
- Our wishes belong to the consciousness that is trying to escape the conditions that it created through its wishes.
- Each wish that we chase after meets with a second force that opposes that wish.

- We would not want the moment to be other than what it is unless there was a desire for the moment to unfold a certain way.
- A wish for a time to come that appears as a result of resistance to an unwanted moment is like an addictive drug.
- The consciousness that wishes for something in a time to come forgets that it created the very conditions that it wishes to escape from.
- Blame is the wish to forget that the uncomfortable situation you don't want is your responsibility.
- The mind never wants what is. It always wants what should be and doesn't want what should not be. A wish that the mind creates is the same as dreaming of a time to come.
- Three true wishes in one that are answered in the moment you make them, and that have nothing to do with a time to come: I wish to see myself as I am in this moment. I wish to understand what I'm aware of without thinking about it. I wish to accept what I don't understand, including my fear of not knowing.
- Anytime you make a wish to escape yourself, you strengthen the order of self that you wish to escape from.
